The developers of Photoshop have brought what is now a state of the art, real-time collaboration tool to the small screen. It's a great way to manage comments and come to a conclusion on a work without disrupting other work or wasting time. The iPad Pro has always made the most asked-about device in all of video editing, and Photoshop Sketch takes it to the next obvious level. All applications show their status in the Notifications Center, a quick list of everything that's running. Settings-> Notifications will give you a full list of every active app and program, including Photoshop Sketch, and "pause" and "resume" next to the app icon show the state of the program. Nik Image Editing for the iPad offers some of the same features as Adobe Photoshop but trades most of the power and features for a wider available set of tools. It still does do some of the things Photoshop can do, such as scroll panoramas and ridiculously large objects, but the difference in power and availability is like night and day. That means the iPad Pro is well-suited for document-centric work, but it probably won't scale up to much beyond that. Nik Software Image Structure and Red Eye Fixer is a basic, one-to-one photo retouching tool for the iPad Pro. It's not a full-blown version of Nik Software's Red Eye Fixer iOS app for the iPad. It's a bit bare bones, and the Photoshop-quality pipeline is much slower than other apps like this. But without spending a dime more, you get a stronger, better tool than most in the same price range, and that means potential users have to actually try it out before they decide to shell out extra for an iPad-optimized version.
